Have you noticed how the term "Customer Service" has morphed?

A few years ago it implied a person making certain your order, complaint, suggestion, etc. was addressed efficiently, effectively and in a timely basis.

Recently we have had several experiences leading us to the conclusion that this has all changed.

Today, the buzzword seems to be more like client systems. That is, the system should work exactly as designed and the order, complaint, suggestion, etc. will automatically be addressed.

Sounds correct, but here's the rub.

When the client system doesn't work you are better off going somewhere else. If you are lucky enough to reach a live person, they usually cannot do any more than you did – Consider the problem at branch banks... the person you talk with usually looks at the same computer screen as you saw with the same result. Try to pay a bill by phone. You punch in a bunch of buttons and something goes awry... you reach a person who politely insinuates that the problem was yours but will take your payment at a $8 or $10 surcharge.

Last month Marie ordered a couple of items from one of the too many catalogs she receives. One item arrived, with 'balance to come'. Balance arrived with three of one item, a duplicate of the item already received and the 'balance' item. I do not have room to describe the difficulty in returning the messed up order and getting the pricing cleared up. Perfect incoming order system – no system for problem resolution

Recently I had occasion for a hospital visit. Arriving at 6am I checked in with the front reception, was sent to another pavilion and checked in there. The volunteer receptionist carefully wrote my name down on his clipboard pad and directed us (Marie was with me, probably to make certain I did not get into 'trouble'). We were directed to have a seat and wait for a call. There were some small offices attached to the larger room and the ladies there began calling names.

So far the system works fine... Then it becomes 7am and I hadn't been called. Then the cell rings (it was packed into a bag in anticipation of my (minor) surgery. The cell quits ringing before I can get to it, but no problem, just check the 'recent calls' and respond. EXCEPT – the return call was the hospital main number and no one there had any idea where my call originated.

Back to the pavilion registration and the good volunteer walked directly to one of the side cubicles and motioned me in. While the lady was taking my information, there was a call (holler) for me from just outside some adjoining doors.

Of course I was asked why I was late and the fact that I was waiting outside for an hour did not seem to resonate, especially from one attendant who rather loudly announced, she had called my name three times.

All went well from there but outside of the doctor, no one indicated concern that I had missed my appointed time or that the doctor's schedule was messed up.

Another 'perfect' system
